Read the following passage about multiculturalism and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the questions from 31 to 40.

DOES MULTICULTURALISM EXIST IN VIETNAM?

(I) Multiculturalism is now an acknowledged and integral concept that exists in many countries across the globe, showcasing the rich diversity of cultures and communities within those nations. (II) It is not difficult to see Asian immigrants wear Hanbok, Kimono or Indian people practice Namaste in Western countries, especially developed countries like Germany, France or powerhouse nations such as the USA. (III) But in Vietnam - a developing country, can multiculturalism still be found? The answer is yes. (IV) It is thriving throughout the country as cultural diversity can be seen in multiple aspects.

The most significant evidence of multiculturalism in Vietnam is the diversity in cuisine between distinct regions and ethnic groups. Citizens of northern Vietnam cook their meals with light-flavored but very sophisticated dishes, while people from the south prefer adding various spices, especially sugar and fish sauce to their dishes. Even within a small region, each ethnic group has its own traditional food such as the five-color sticky rice of the Tay people or the grilled fish of the Thai people.

Moreover, clothing plays a significant role as the second key factor contributing to the rich cultural diversity in Vietnam. It reflects the unique traditions, customs, and lifestyles of various ethnic groups, highlighting the nation's vibrant and multifaceted heritage. It is commonly assumed that the Ao dai is the national costume of Vietnam and it is worn commonly by all Vietnamese people, but it is only famous among Kinh people. Meanwhile, the traditional garment of other ethnic groups has a certain degree of uniqueness and creativity. For instance, Khmer people, as affected by Thai culture and Buddhism, often wear Sarong in their daily life.

In addition, Vietnam was recognized as having a very high degree of religious diversity according to surveys by the Pew Forum Institute (USA). There are many different forms of religion, from ancient religious forms such as Totemism, Shamanism, and Animism to modern, well-organized religious groups, for example, Catholicism, Buddhism, Protestantism, and Islam. Today, 16 religions are officially recognized by the state.

Although Vietnamese people may appear different at first glance due to their diverse ethnic backgrounds, they still share notable similarities in physical features. This is largely because all ethnic groups in Vietnam trace their roots back to a common origin, stemming from the ancestors of Southeast Asia. Therefore, there is not much racism and racial tension within the country though some Kinh people want ethnic minorities to assimilate into the Kinh community.
