The circular economy is a new way to make and use things. Instead of throwing items away after using them, we keep and reuse them for a long time. This helps reduce waste and pollution in our environment. Companies are now changing how they make products so that materials can be used again and again. This new system is different from the old way where we just buy, use, and throw away things.

Many companies now have repair centers where people can fix their broken items. For example, some phone companies help customers repair their old phones instead of buying new ones. Clothing stores also teach people how to fix torn clothes or change old clothes into new styles. These actions help save money and protect our planet by making things last longer.

Recycling is another important part of the circular economy. When we cannot reuse things anymore, we can recycle them. First, we need to separate different materials like paper, plastic, and glass. Then, these materials go to special factories where workers clean and process them. After that, companies can use these materials to make new products. This process helps save natural resources and energy.

The circular economy brings many benefits to our world. It creates new jobs in repair shops and recycling centers. It also helps keep our air and water clean by reducing pollution. However, changing to this new system takes time and effort. Everyone needs to learn new habits and work together. If we all join in, we can make our planet healthier for future generations.
