II. Read the following passage about Archiving Endangered Musical Traditions and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions

Music is an important part of every culture. Many old musical traditions are at risk of being lost forever. In small villages and remote communities, traditional songs and music forms are slowly disappearing. Young people today often prefer modern music styles over their traditional music heritage. This is why some experts are working hard to save these endangered musical traditions.

Recording teams travel to distant places to capture rare musical performances. They use special equipment to make high-quality recordings of traditional musicians. These recordings are then stored in digital archives where they will be safe for many years. The teams also collect information about the instruments, the musicians, and the cultural meaning of each piece. This work is urgent because many elder musicians are the last ones who know certain songs or playing techniques.

Museums and universities are creating special programs to share these musical treasures. They organize concerts where people can hear traditional music performed live. Some schools are teaching children how to play traditional instruments and sing folk songs. The internet has become a valuable tool for sharing these recordings with people around the world. Through websites and apps, anyone can listen to rare musical traditions that might otherwise vanish.

Preserving musical traditions is not just about saving sounds. It is about protecting cultural identity and history. When a musical tradition dies, communities lose part of their heritage and unique voice. Each song contains stories, values, and wisdom passed down through generations. By archiving endangered musical traditions, we keep cultural diversity alive in our increasingly connected world. These preservation efforts help communities maintain their cultural pride while sharing their unique musical gifts with the world.

In a nuclear family , particularly if parents are both working, children may have to spend a lot of time on their own. For example, when children come home from school, they may be alone until one or both of their parents arrive. Many children becoe very independent under these circumstances. They may do some of the work at home and enjoy the opportunities to help their family. This is true of older children.

Younger children, however, may have trouble entertaining themselves. After school, they may come home and go immidiately to the television and watch one show after another until one of their parents comes home. They my feel bored and lonely. If they lived in an extended family and had other adults besides their parents around, they might benefit from the attention of these adults. Also, they might have cousins to play with. Certaintly , they would not spend so much time alone.
