Traditional methods of teaching no longer suffice in this technological world. Students, mediocre and bright alike, from the first grade through high school, not only are not intimidated by computers, but have become avid participants in the computer epoch.

Kids operating computers implement their curriculum with great versatility. A music student can program musical notes so that the computer will play Beethoven or the Beetles. For a biology class, the computer can produce a picture of the intricate actions of the body organs, that enabling today's students to investigate human biology in a profound way. A nuclear reactor is no longer an enigma to students who can see its workings in minute detail on a computer.

In Wisconsin, the Chippewa Indians are studying their ancient and almost forgotten language with the aid of a computer. More commonly, the computer is used for drilling math and language concepts so that youngster may learn at their own speed without trying the patience of their human teachers. The simplest computers aid the handicapped, who learn more rapidly from the computer than from humans. Once irksome, remedial drills and exercises now on computer are conducive to learning because the machine responds to correct answers with praise and to incorrect answers with frowns and even an occasional tear.

Adolescents have become so exhilarated by computers that they have developed their own jargon, easily understood by their peers but leaving their disconcerted parents in the dark. They have shown so much fervor for computers that they have formed computer clubs, beguiled their leisure hours in computer stores, and even the attended computer camps. A Boy Scout can get a computer merit badge. One ingenious young student devised a computer game for Atari that will earn him $100,000 in royalties.
