An Binh Island and Its Unusual Local Features

An Binh Island, a small part of Ly Son District in central Vietnam, is well known for its beautiful beaches and calm atmosphere. Visitors often describe it as a “mini Maldives” because of its clear blue water and peaceful natural scenery. Although the island has become more popular in recent years, it still keeps its simple lifestyle and traditional culture.

The island covers less than one square kilometer, and most families depend on fishing or growing vegetables such as onions and garlic. Tourism brings new jobs, but services remain limited. Only a few homestays provide accommodation for tourists, and there are no large restaurants. As a result, many visitors choose to eat at their homestays or bring snacks with them.

An interesting feature of An Binh is that it has only one small breakfast stall, and it usually sells out early in the morning. Because of this, travelers must wake up early if they want a proper meal. Cash is also necessary since most shops on the island do not accept digital payments.

Fresh water is another unusual issue. Since the island does not have enough natural water sources, local people often collect rainwater or buy water from the larger island nearby. This makes water a valuable resource that everyone must use carefully.

Despite these challenges, An Binh attracts tourists who enjoy activities such as swimming, kayaking, and exploring coral reefs. The island is ideal for people seeking a quiet place to relax away from the busy city life.
